

Det Havske Statinstitut

ICHS

International Conference on Havlandic Studies

2012 International Conference on Havlandic Studies

*Introduction to Havlandic Etymology – H. Hole
Speaker Notes (English)*

Case Study - Torman (Attack)

HAVSKE: Det 1939 offentormaning ond wearr on Suomi fra Sovjetunionen var an storfail. Mere dan 160.000 Sovjet *tormaner*er vær dræbt.

ENGELSK: The 1939 invasion (lit. “open military assault/invasion”) and war on Finland started by the Soviet Union was a massive failure. More than 160,000 Soviet soldiers were killed.

Etymology of Torman

Pre-1430: Artorcniht (n. “great /chivalric knight”, from Arthur [likely King Arthur] + Old English cniht i.e. “knight”)

~1430-1600: Artormann (n. “heroic or brave man”, from -mann suffix denoting “someone related to”)

~1600-1730: tormanlic (adj. “brave, warrior-like, combative, deadly”, from -lic suffix denoting “-like”)

~1730-1900: torman (v. “attack, assault, challenge” or n. “soldier, assailant, thug”)

~1900+: torman (v. “to attack or invade”) → tormaner (n. “professional soldier”), tormaning (n. “military assault, invasion” or p. pr. of torman)

Analysis

- Artorcniht likely began as a literary term in Anglophone Old Havlandic (AOH) → We see an example of usage in Book of Hans, manuscript XX. However, the suffix -cniht (and its associated word) quickly fell out of usage, and the more common suffix -mann was used when it transitioned to oral usage (see: scipmann, jarlmann, lagrmann).
- Artor becomes wedded to mann and falls out of usage as an individual word or prefix (See “ruth” and “ruthless”). Last known independent example of “Artor” is “artorlic kongen” in Historia Havland (1450s), which appears to be a neologism.
- Final -n is dropped after Kalmar period and artormann becomes primarily an adjective, gaining suffix -lic (See caldlic or woodlic). In the process the first syllable “ar” is shortened (AR-tor-mann-lic → ar-TORman-lic) and then lost.

- During Talereform of 1730s-60s -lic and similar suffixes are scrapped for Danish suffixes. Torman is now a noun and verb (similar to how someone can go “soldiering”). Scholars usually stop defining torman as an AOH term now and it enters general Havlandic usage in this period. It also gains a strong association with soldiers → In this period the word kongenstorman is coined, “The king’s soldier”, also perjorative appellation “the king’s enforcer/thug” or “royal sympathiser”, and thus another name for taxman.
- The usage of torman as a verb meaning “military assault” gains preeminence post 1900 and usage as a noun declines. Havske Posten (The Havlandic Post) uses “hemmligtormaning” (secret/hidden + tormaning) to describe the 1916 surprise attack of British tanks in World War 1. The official term for Havlandic soldier in the Havlandic republican military is “havsketormaner” (solidified in the Constitution of Havland), replacing “havskesoldat” used in the Havlandic Royal Army.